Will bring thy harvest, surely

Abigail Minerva Batchelor, spinster and school teacher, had relinquished her long-cherished dream of spending two weeks of her summer vacation at the beach. She had been born and raised inland, so the grandeur of the sea was only known to her imagination.

She had laid aside a little hoard for that indulgence; it seemed almost sinful, she felt vaguely as though she should feel like the one who had "wasted his substance in riotous living" on her return; her intense, ascetic nature, inherited from the generation who felt upon them the eve of a jealous God in this world, and probably flames for their neighbors in the next, had been trained up in self-denial and rigid economy.

In her rebellious moments she thought bitterly that never, under any circumstances, had she ever realized her humblest ideal. By what seemingly personal spite of fate was it that she was always defrauded and left out in the cold in both great and small things. Her pretty mouth had grown into a compressed line, the wild rose color of her cheeks crept back the ghost of itself only under strong excitement. Her "uppish" ways scared off the rustic lovers she might have had. Only one was bold enough to venture near, and her sarcasm withered him so that he seemed abashed ever after.

But this one pet dream she would see realized, nothing should come in the way. "I have starved, starved all my life; I will know what it is to have one unalloyed joy before MORTGAGE SALE.

I am too old to care for anything but the grave."

So surreptitiously she had ordered a pretty blue flannel dress with a blouse waist and a pale pink kerchief to wear with it. The dress came she surregaled it away and in and to being claimed that there is now due and uppaid, at the date hereof, on said mortgage, the surregaled it away and in the date hereof, on said mortgage, the surregaled it away and in surregaled it away and it being claimed that there is now due and uppaid, at the date hereof, on said mortgage, the surregaled it away and in surregaled it away as a surregaled it away and in surregaled it away as a surregaled it a packed a small valise and took the train for Edgewood.

Poor Carrie felt a load lifted when she saw the practical face and figure of her older sister. A few weak tears of gladness strayed down on the little brown head of the red-faced, blinking baby that she bent over.

It was after one o'clock, the dinner table, in a state of chaos, stood in the middle of the pretty little dining-room, the sun beat in, and flies swarmed like an Egyptian plague. Harry, Willie, and the nurse were engaged in a triangular struggle of which no one could predict the result. Abby tied her new apron string with a snap and laying a firm hand on a shoulder of each boy brought them to a halt.

"Where are the boys?" she asked. "I have sent them out to play, they are all right; don't fret about them, thank your lucky stars for quiet, they will be in soon enough." "I wish you would call them, Abby, I feel auxious." "Now, Cal, I won't do anything

Poor Carrie. She lay in her bed fretting about the buttons that came off, the clothes that were unbrushed. the collars that were soiled, the stockings that were a little twisted on the sturdy legs that were never still long enough to be straightened, and Abby's strict discipline-that was never unkindness-brought tears to her eyes and she petted and kissed her darlings, gave them no thoughts of any one but themselves, and made a rod for her own back.

"If I should ever so far forget myself as to marry and have children, I would begin from the moment of their birth to train them properly. I would have none of this slaving over white dresses, lace, embroidery, linen suits, etc., no holding and recking to sleep; a child can be reared sensibly and affectionately at the same time," said practical Abby.

Abby's advice and example did O'Brien & Sleator, Attorneys for Mortgagoo. not count for much. When Carrie was about the house again, it was mot count for much. When Carrie was about the house again, it was the same old querulous struggle with the enemy dirt and "style."

Such washes and ironings the neighbors said they never saw, she was a perfect slave to her three children, and as the old nurse said, they were the most "unbidable" young ones she ever knew.

Abby stayed until it was almost time for her school to commence again, her poor little dream of the summer locked quietly away in her strong heart. Another long winter and then she would go where her dream led. At last the summer vacation came, Abby decided to stuff the ears of her conscience with cotton wool if necessary, and go on her daring journey come what would.

cially attractive department of science, selt exerts so marked an influence on the health of the organs of the body. Nerve force is produced by the brain and conveyed by means of the nerves to the various organs of the body, thus supplying the latter with the vitality necessary to insure their health. The meumogastric nerve, as shown here, may be said to be the most important of the entire nerve system, as it supplies the heart, lungs, stomach, lowels, etc., with the nerve force necessary to keep them active and healthy. As will be seen by the cut the long nerve descending from the base of the brain and terminating in the bowels is the pneumogastric, while the numerous little branches supply the heart, lungs and stom-

The noted specialist, Frankin Miles, M. D., L. B., has given the greater part of his life to the study of this subject, and the principal discoveries concerning it are due to his efforts. Ir. Miles' Restorative Nervine, the unrivaled brain and nerve food, is prepared on the principle that all nervous and many other difficulties originate from disorders of the nerve centers. Its wonderful success in curing these disorders is testified to by thousands in every part of the land.
